Giving patients the utmost care

Mr Keshvaran S/O Karnaneedi, who is taking up an Edinburgh Napier University, UK nursing degree at MDIS, goes beyond giving medical care to his patients

BY GEL CABOTAJE

Some patients – worrying about their health – may feel anxious and uneasy in the hospital. A caring nurse will help soothe these feelings and even alleviate any physical pain the patients may have.

For 24-year-old registered nurse Keshvaran S/O Karnaneedi, his goal is to make patients in his care as comfortable as possible, even if it goes beyond his core responsibilities.

“Whenever I am done with my duties, I will always take some time to interact with my patients, to understand them better,” he says. “They usually enjoy my company and when my patients are happy, I am happy too.”

Formerly a trainee nurse in an oncology ward, Mr Keshvaran says there is a misconception that all cancer patients are weak and have ailing health.

“However, from my experience, they are among some of the most fun, positive and open-minded patients I’ve ever met,” he says.

“I do not merely interact with the patients to understand them better. Some of them tend to be lonely and do not have visitors. Connecting with them is a way for me to alleviate their loneliness and give them my attention, care and moral support,” he adds.

Mr Keshvaran is currently serving National Service (NS) at Singapore Civil Defence Force as an emergency medical technician while studying part-time at Management Development Institute of Singapore (MDIS). He is taking the top-up bachelor’s degree programme in nursing awarded by Edinburgh Napier University, UK.

“The nursing programme at MDIS has helped me to build up my leadership qualities, shape my critical thinking skills and provide solutions to my patients and even my colleagues,” he says.

Mr Keshvaran wants to become a full-time nurse after completing NS and plans to further his studies to focus on a speciality which he will decide down the road.

For now, he is bent on giving his utmost care to the people who most need it. “Whenever I end my shift, my patients or their loved ones ask me whether I am working the next day. When I tell them that I will return and they respond with a smile, I know that my efforts have been worthwhile,” Mr Keshvaran says.

Breaking gender stereotypes

Mr Kenneth Chia, who pursued The University of Sydney’s bachelor’s degree in nursing at SIM GE, has had his heart set on a career in healthcare since childhood

BY MICHELLE CHIN

More men are entering the nursing profession. The number of male nurses registered with the Singapore Nursing Board has increased from about 3,500 in 2014 to 4,700 last year. There were more than 42,000 nurses in Singapore as of last year.

The nursing profession may still be largely dominated by women, but for Mr Kenneth Chia, 27, gender is no barrier to the profession.

Mr Chia now works as a staff nurse at Changi General Hospital’s Accident & Emergency Department. When he was a child, he was admitted into a hospital due to asthma complications; Mr Chia was so touched by the care he received that he made nursing his childhood dream.

Mr Chia was part of his secondary school’s St John Brigade, pursued nursing courses at ITE College East and Nanyang Polytechnic.

He also completed a Bachelor of Nursing (Post-Registration) degree at SIM Global Education (SIM GE) in July 2017.

The Bachelor of Nursing (Post-Registration) programme, which can be completed on a one-year or two-year part-time basis, is developed and awarded by The University of Sydney and offered at SIM GE in Singapore. It is fully-taught by academics from The University of Sydney.

This year marks 25 years of partnership between SIM GE and The University of Sydney, and over 3,500 health professionals have graduated with nursing and health science-related degrees through the partnership.

Mr Chia shares more about the programme he graduated from and his experiences in nursing:

What is it like working in a female-majority field?

As nurses, we respect one another’s area of work regardless of gender. It is perfectly all right for a male nurse to display his softer side when providing care for patients.

My advice to people considering a nursing career is not to let gender norms get in the way... Sometimes, it is also easier for male nurses to communicate with male patients who are uncomfortable sharing their problems with female nurses.

How was the bachelor’s degree helpful?

My academic journey with The University of Sydney at SIM GE provided me with a new education experience of interacting with esteemed educators who are leaders in their respective fields.

The course has helped me to broaden my clinical knowledge and skills to deliver quality care to patients.

What are some unforgettable moments you’ve had working in the A&E department?

I remember vividly this elderly lady who was admitted after falling at home in the toilet. She had been immobilised for days. My colleague and I brought her up to one of the wards.

After she was cleaned, fed and her wounds properly dressed, she thanked us profusely. I was overwhelmed with emotions that day.

As nurses, we respect one another’s area of work regardless of gender. It is perfectly all right for a male nurse to display his softer side when providing care for patients.
